

Monthly Review

The Fund continues being under-exposed to the equity markets of Emerging Markets, as we are considering them unattractive in light of the divergent scenarios that we envisage for 2019.

If a marked global economic slowdown were to materialize, Emerging Economies would suffer a significant negative impact, in particular on domestic consumption, most likely causing an increase in risk premia. Were the economic slowdown to be only temporary, the risk of a gradual increase in interest rates, starting from the US, might have a negative effect, especially on those economies burdened by excessive US dollar debt.

With an economically weak Europe – struggling with uncertain elections in May – we will continue being structurally overweight the US market, with a portfolio seeking a balanced mix of Value and Growth stocks.
